

The Dinosaur Circus

In a land where dinosaurs roamed with glee,
There stood a circus, for all to see.
Under the big top, excitement did swell,
For the greatest show on earth, they knew so well.

With a flourish and a fanfare, the show did begin,
As dinosaurs danced and performed with a grin.
From the graceful triceratops, twirling with grace,
To the daring pterodactyl, soaring through space.

"Step right up, step right up," cried the ringmaster loud,
"Come see the spectacle, make your hearts proud!"
The audience cheered, their excitement so grand,
As they watched the performers take the stand.

Through hoops they jumped, with agility rare,
Their talents on display, filling the air.
The stegosaurus balanced, on a tiny wire thin,
While the brontosaurus spun, with a dizzying spin.

In between acts, the dinosaurs chatted away,
Sharing stories and laughter, throughout the day.
"We've practiced so hard, to put on this show,"

Said the triceratops proudly, her horn all aglow.

As the sun dipped low and the stars shone bright,

The final act began, with all of their might.

The T-Rex roared, as he jumped through the flames,

His bravery and skill, never to be tamed.

And as the curtain fell on this wondrous display,

The audience erupted, with cheers hooray.

For the dinosaur circus had truly been grand,

The greatest show on earth, in all the land.

The end.

The Dinosaur Circus

As the last echoes of applause faded away,
The dinosaurs basked in the warmth of the day.
For they knew they'd achieved something truly
profound,
Bringing joy and wonder to all who came 'round.

With hearts full of memories, they bid their adieu,
But the magic they'd shared would continue to brew.
For the dinosaur circus had left its mark,
A reminder that joy can light up the dark.

And as they journeyed onwards, to lands far and wide,
They carried with them the joy of the ride
For the greatest show on earth had come to an end,
